L'Oréal–UNESCO For Women in Science Hungarian Fellowship 2024

Dr. Éva Borbély, an associate professor at the University of Pécs's Institute of Pharmacology and Pharmacotherapy, received the L'Oréal-UNESCO "Women in Science" award in recognition of her outstanding research. 2024 marked the 22nd edition of the award in Hungary, with an overall prize pool of 7.5 million HUF. Her work focuses on elucidating how central nervous system disorders—such as memory decline in aging, stress, anxiety, depression, and chronic pain—interconnect via molecular signaling. Her goal is to reveal pathways that could allow development of therapies targeting multiple disorders simultaneously, ideally with fewer side effects.

The current Pecs blog continues its results.

Women engineers campaign

What is the engineering profession like today from a female perspective, is studying for an engineer, becoming an engineer an attractive, interesting process that also means self-realization for women in the 21st century – these were the topics that were the focus of the photo, poster and video competition announced last year by the PTE MIK for engineers, female engineers and future engineers, for which about fifty entries were received, including entries from several men and foreign students. In connection with this, a blog featuring female engineers was launched on the application website mernoknok.hu. Today, the content of the platform focuses on a broader range, as the project has sparked a kind of thinking and discussion about the engineering career, women's roles, barriers, and motivating forces. In addition to presenting the everyday life of the engineering career, the blog also covers professional topics of interest to students, as well as many aspects of student life.
